

The American people Rule that the FCC may NOT end Net Neutrality. They must vote to keep Title II protections that classify the internet as a regulated utility. To try to repeal Net Neutrality will infringe on the free speech of most Americans, especially low income earners, and small businesses that do not have the monetary resources to pay exorbitant fees when telecommunication companies will inevitably begin to price gouge their customers.

Given that the current administration is systematically dismantle consumer protections in all facets of life, and is plunging the nation into a totalitarian dictatorship, repealing Net Neutrality presents a clear and present danger to the citizens of the united states. The price gouging inherent to "slow lane/fast lane" pricing schemes will effectively diminish the ability of the citizenry to communicate effectively, and to research current events, legislation being passed locally and nationally, or to communicate with their associates, friends, and family members. Therefore, any attempt to end Net Neutrality is tantamount to treason, and is not permitted under the First Amendment.

The internet is a Title II utility, and as such all title II protections must be upheld. Any attempt by the FCC to end such protections is necessary, unwanted, and morally wrong.
